Dry Bank Holiday

2 May 2002

The Bank Holiday weekend looks set to be largely fine and dry, the Met Office has said today.

Most places will see dry weather for much of weekend with just a few well-scattered showers. Daytime temperatures will reach 16 °C in the warmest inland spots, with slightly cooler conditions around the coast.

Nigel Reed, Head of Forecasting at the Met Office, said: "We can't expect too much of early May so it might not be sunbathing weather, but it should be a pleasant Bank Holiday weekend. However, gardeners should be aware that there may be a touch of ground frost at night."

Notes
Bank Holiday Monday 2001 was fine and sunny in many places, with a chill north-easterly wind on the coasts. East Kilbride in Lanarkshire recorded highs of 21 °C.
